While the .|| Motorstorm Keeps Chilly on PS Vita The PlayStation Vita's first game isn't what you'd call a "hardcore racer." Motorstorm doesn't have the visuals of the PS3 version, but its Vita port is a brilliant introduction to the Vita's gaming potential. There are two main elements that make Motorstorm on the Vita feel so good. The first is the Vita's analog sticks. Both are positioned perfectly for easy control and combine with the clever tilt-and-swipe interface to offer a suitable alternative to button-based control schemes. The second is inversion, the process by which you simply flip your game upside down and there you go -- a familiar series of blue pipes hovering above two LCDs has been replaced by a single wheel and two brushed metal case halves. The title's mixture of mini-golf, the arcade-inspired Robot Wars, and the wild environment-interacting (or controlling) of an automotive sports racer are all present in the PS Vita version, albeit without the realism of the PC version. The new Vita version feels so much tighter; the huge destruction of Motorstorm: Arctic Circle on the PC is replaced here by abstracted, safe to knock over edges which you have to avoid unless you're going for a drifting

year on Mindanao, Camiguin, Albay, Batanes, Palawan and Marinduque due to the threat posed by armed communist rebels, and the government's inability to stop the New People's Army. This is the first time in the history of the Philippines that a martial law was extended. Aquino explained that this was not a military decision, but it was based on the decision of the President after receiving recommendations from the Philippine National Police (PNP) and the Department of National Defense (DND). "If the President does not exercise the option to declare Martial Law, I am certain that the situation will only get worse," he added. During the press conference, the President reiterated that he was not declaring martial law for political reasons. President Aquino said that the military must help the government enforce the law and ensure safety of the people. "Let me be blunt and frank. I am not declaring martial law in Mindanao to oppress the Muslims. I am doing it to save the lives and property of the good people there," he said. "I declare martial law because it is the only way to ensure the safety and security of people, who in these times cannot be left without security." The President announced that until his final decision on July 26 this year, the administration will give peace talks as much "preferential treatment" as possible. He added that he would do whatever it takes to deliver the peace, even if it means suspending the privilege of regular election procedures. "This is the right thing to do, to give these rebels a chance to reconcile," he said. "If we are able to achieve this, it will be a great thing, and our nation's condition will be better."
